SUMMIT REPORT
Thiruvananthapuram/Gangtok, 29 Sept: India has emerged as a significant and strong led in preventing Plastic Pollution – that eliminates plastic pollution, through plastic-free packaging and discouraging the use of alternative materials, such as bio-based or biodegradable plastics. This approach is supported by the state and national governments.

6. The government, through the Formative Assessment (FA) and Summative Assessment (SA) of the academic year, must set clear and time-bound commitments on the plastic waste rules to ensure that all the necessary actions are taken.

7. The government should enforce such laws with clear and time-bound commitments on the plastic waste rules to ensure that all the necessary actions are taken.

8. Central or state governments should make national-level biotech hubs and research facilities that are funded by Indian Council of Medical Research and other reputed National and International Level Biotech Hub.

4. The government should also support the state of the art institutional Biotech Hub, National Institute of Biotechnology and Microbiology, Sikkim, within the state administrative will.

Infographics & Videos

1. The government should introduce the 2-year phase out deadline on problematic plastic types or products, maintaining stipulated percentage of plastic waste management rules and regulations.

2. The government should ensure that the use of recycled plastic is incentivized over virgin plastic. This should be accompanied with a clear position on the banned materials, such as bio-based, biodegradable and compostable plastic, with justifications for what is and what is not – a good use of these materials.

3. The Philippines has also presented his scientific papers in National and International Level Biotech Hub.

5. Add EPR cess to plastic packaged products and reduce tax rate for plastic products maintaining good use of the material.

The government needs to make sure that the proper legislation is in place, and that they can continue pumping out cheap, disposable plastic, polluting the planet at a devastating rate. Real solutions, such as mandatory collection of packaging, policies to increase reuse and phase out certain problematic plastic types, are rarely funder in the voluntary approach and are shamefully bought against if proposed by policy-makers.

Policy-makers should adopt progressive legislation, built on the open-source software of the plastic pollution crisis for decades.

The government should introduce new plastic waste management rules and regulations that maintains plastic in a closed loop without time-bound deadlines. This creates a market for effective plastic recycling and maintains a closed loop without plastic incineration.

The government should consider a tax on virgin plastic, which enforces the use of recycled plastic incentivized over virgin plastic. This should be accompanied with a clear position on the banned materials, such as bio-based, biodegradable and compostable plastic, with justifications for what is and what is not – a good use of these materials.

humanitarian agencies – such as the World Food Programme (WFP) – are increasingly using cash as a way of delivering assistance to vulnerable people. Conventionally, humanitarian agencies procure food or other goods and then distribute it directly to recipients. But cash transfers allow people to choose and purchase what they need for themselves. This gives them access to enhanced autonomy, reducing costs, and boosting local markets. For instance, in 2019, the WFP distributed US$1.2 billion in transfers to 7.7 million vulnerable households.

Cash transfers come in many forms, such as mobile money or bank accounts. They generally provide recipients with cash services, but can sometimes be issued with restrictions on the kinds of goods that can be purchased.

These options raise important questions that organisations must grapple with during programme design. For instance, the degree of autonomy recipients have in their use of assistance and how the transfer should be made.

In June 2019, the WFP began to roll out a new cash transfer programme – for about 1,000 households – which had a different approach: it removed restrictions on what could be spent, and provided cash directly into bank accounts and the cash could be spent on anything the household desired. We studied both of these approaches and two key lessons emerged from our research:

There is some evidence that unrestricted transfers lead to higher expenditure on alcohol and tobacco, but this was only reported by a low percentage of households (14%) and a small proportion of their budgets (3.7%).

The overall results of the pilot experiment of restricted cash transfers had robust positive effects on welfare, asset accumulation and subjective well-being.

Unrestricted cash gave recipients the option to use their assistance on non-food items, such as clothing, cooking fuel, and school equipment for their children. Moreover, refugees could choose to purchase many more desirable cash benefits with that comes the arrogance which, at least in our eras-throughput, is shown in how they are to be seen. In Sikkim's case, the news-media ad bottom of the ignorance barrel to claim and explain outright lies in how the Kanhaiya episode at JNU was able journalism.

They, the editors will be forced to read them and soon, stressing, is essential if journalism is to inform and be much better informed than they actually are. This analysis reveals that the switch to unrestricted cash transfers had robust positive effects on welfare, asset accumulation and subjective well-being.

First, there are some pros and some cons to restricting cash transfers. Restricted cash transfers have in their use of assistance and how the transfer should be made.

Moving forward, the WFP and other humanitarian organisations need to pay more attention to the use of cash assistance. In particular, they need to consider the long-term effects of providing unrestricted cash transfers and whether these benefits are likely to endure over time.

The WFP is committed to continuing its efforts to improve the delivery of assistance to the world’s most vulnerable people. We believe that the use of cash assistance can help to achieve our goal of helping those in need, while also providing them with greater choice, but sometimes come with a risk that many people do not realise the benefits of unrestricted cash transfers to their lives.

In conclusion, while unrestricted cash transfers offer many benefits, they also come with risks. Humanitarian organisations need to carefully consider the potential risks and benefits before implementing such programmes, and to continually monitor and evaluate their impact.
Nagaland in deep financial crisis; 2020-21 expected to close with Rs 2358.81 cr deficit

DINAMO, Sept 24 (NagalalandPage): Nagaland is facing deep financial crisis and the situation is likely to worsen as the share of Central taxes and duties is yet to be determined by various organs.

From the midnight of April 20, Nagaland was charging COVID-19 tax on all petrol and diesel having a pump price between Rs 5 and Rs 7.5 per litre to control fuel prices and also to offset the loss of tax revenue due to lockdown.

The government took the decision during a cabinet meeting held at Heiv-malima in Dimapur on Thursday. Land Revenue and Parliamentary Affairs, Nemcha Kipgen, who also holds the charge of Finance, said that the main objective of the COVID-19 tax was to control the increase in the prices of both petrol and diesel.

The government expected to collect a revenue of Rs 1607.73 crores from the tax on petrol and diesel during 2020-21.

“Due to the lockdown, the number of vehicles plying on the roads had reduced and there was a resultant decline in the collection of fuel tax revenue. In order to control fuel prices and to meet the revenue shortfall caused by the lockdown, the government levied the tax,” Kipgen said.

He further said that the tax was likely to come into effect from Wednesday and the government is likely to announce the pump prices of both petrol and diesel.

The government is also expected to collect a revenue of Rs 4.97 crore from the tax on petrol and diesel during 2020-21. The government is also likely to announce the pump prices of both petrol and diesel.

China unmistakably violated Taiwan's airspace under the guise of a high-profile choreography to send a message and teach a lesson that the island is the end of Taiwan's history and reverse the Taiwan question globally, she said.
